CASE OF MRS. SURRATT.

In the course of Mr. Merrick's speech to the jury in the case of John Sorratt he thus spoke of Mrs. Surratt.

Says the learned attorney upon the other side, [Mr. Pierrepont] in a speech delivered, I think, before you were empannelled:

Did you find anything at the close of it that whispers and is heard. It descends upon the meet them as part of the case. I should have been glad to have heard that proof. Who of you is there who was in the city of Washington, who will ever forget that fatal day when strewn by that heart-broken daughter, who for the tolling of the bells reminded you of the sad | the past two years has been earnestly pleading fact that the hour had come when those people | that she might have the privilege of placing were to be hung. The storm beat against your arm, and it fell powerless in the tempest. You remember that day, gentlemen. Twenty-four hours for preparation. . The echoes of the announcement of impending death scarcely dying away before the tramp of the approaching guard was heard leading to the gallows. Priest, friend, philanthropist, and clergymen went to the Executive Mansion to get access to the President, to implore for that poor woman three days' respite, to prepare her soul to meet her God, but got no access. The heart-broken child-the poor daughter went there erazed, and stretched upon the steps that lead to the Executive Chamber, she raised her hands in agony and prayed to every one that came, "Oh, God! let me have access, that I may ask for but one day for my poor mother; just one day!" Did she get there? No. And yet, says the counsel, there was no one to prevent access being had. Why did'nt you prove it?-Oh, God! If such a thing could have been proved, how would I have rejoiced in the fact; for when reflecting upon that sad, unfortunate, wretched hour in the history of my countryan hour when I feel she was so much degraded, I could weep until the paper be worn away with the continual dropping of my tears. whilst another died by his own violent hands in Following on Judge Pirrepont's declaration, which I have read to you, and these circumstances, comes Mr. Carrington, breaking the cerements of the tomb, and demanding your verdict against Mrs. Surratt. In God's name, is nt it enough to try the living? Will you play the goul, and bring her from the cold, cold earth; and hang her corpse? Bring her in; but there is no occasion for doing so; she is here already. We have felt our blood run cold as the rustling of the garments from the grave swept by us. Her spirit moves about, and the Judge Advocate General, and all those men may understond that it is the eternal law of God -though, so far as men are concerned, fresh and innocent blood may apparently vindicate blood previously shed-yet the spirit will still walk beside them. He may shudder before her, because she is with him by day and by night; and he may say, Avaunt! and quit my sight! Let the earth hide presaging that great judgment day when all and when Mrs. Surratt is called to testify against Joseph Holt, what will he in yindica tion say?

Gentlemen of the jury, if my learned brethren are going to try her in this case, why not give us the benefit of her dying declarations? Mr. Carrington, your Honor, has gone outside of this record, and I must follow him to some extent, at least. He has gone outside of it in speaking of the military commission, defending the major generals and others. I am glad I recurred to it, for it reminds me of a statement of his that I desire to correct. He says we accused these honorable men of murder. No, sir; I refrain from any expression of opinion on that subject. It is true that the most exalted judicial tribunal in the world, vindicating the liberty of American citizens and their Conover the military law, has pronounced that and all other commissions similarly constituted to be illegal: but what I denounce here is not the men who in judgment sat there, but the men conducting the trial, and who with this diary of Booth in their hands, could have proved Mrs. Surratt's innocence by showing this conspiracy to have been organized on the 14th day of April; but who, though producing
